Methodist Home Tackling Georgia's Foster Parent Shortage

In May, the Methodist Home in Macon announced a new effort to address the high demand for foster parents.

In Middle Georgia alone, there are more than 600 foster children in the system waiting to be placed with families. That's why the Methodist Home's Hope Foster Care program has been working to recruit and train more foster parents here in Middle Georgia—foster parents like Elle Garrison.

Elle Garrison is a foster mother to four children—a one year-old, two year-old, three year-old and 12 year-old. "I'm kind of out of the box of what people would picture for a foster family," she said. She's a single parent with a full house—and she was trained through the Hope Foster Care program.

"Our entire goal is to recruit train and then support foster Families here in Middle Georgia," said resource developer Loren Rae Grace.

Bibb County DCFS's Paul Williamson says the demand for local foster parents like Elle Garrison is high, but the number of families willing to become foster parents—not so much. "We just don't have the families so that we're able to place the children inside the middle Georgia area," he said. That's why Grace says she and others want to keep these kids close to home—by recruiting more local residents to become foster parents.

"If they're placed far away from their community then that means their ongoing communication with their biological family is much more of a challenge. If we can keep children here in middle Georgia we can make sure they remain connected to their community connected to their biological family," said Grace.

It's a 10 week program to guide parents through the process. "It's called IMPACT training so they go through the training, and we equip them to meet the needs of children who have come through trauma, we equip them to make sure their homes are ready and we help them through the home steady process," Grace added.

Garrison says even though fostering isn't always easy she wants others to know you don't have to be perfect to be a parent. "You know to love kids and to embrace a different family that probably comes from a different place than they come from." She continued, "If you are willing to provide for one child a safe place to go you'd be a great fit for foster care."

There are more than 13,000 foster kids across the state and 650 of those are here in Middle Georgia.

The first IMPACT session began on May 25th. We hope this program helps in keeping more of our CASA children in the circuit for foster care.

Volunteer Spotlight: Diane Halloran

CASA volunteer, Diane Halloran has spent her entire career serving children as a school counselor in Titusville, Florida; Conyers, Georgia and most recently at Morgan County Primary School in Madison, Georgia. She holds a MA and an Ed.S in counseling and guidance and spent 35 years in the field working with children before retiring in 2014.

Diane says, “When I worked as a counselor, I often worked with the CASA volunteers who would visit the children in our school. I was so impressed with what they did for children through the relationships they built. When I retired, it just seemed so logical to devote my time to continuing to help children. I was moved by the fact that Judge Phil Spivey told our ‘graduating class’ that he paid much attention to the CASA volunteers’ opinions and leaned heavily on their assessments of situations. He let us know that our opinions really mattered – he really listened! This convinced me that I could use my training and my love of children to continue to assist children whose lives needed some stability.”

Diane has been involved with several CASA cases, but has been very impressed with three siblings in one of her more complicated (and lengthy) cases. “Their love and protectiveness of one for another has lasted throughout abandonment, separation and hardship. There is a bond there that results clearly from their survival and goes beyond ordinary sibling relationships. They have had to survive on their own for so long, and they have done so remarkably well. When given choices to make decisions concerning their future, each clearly considers the others before making their own decisions. It really is a beautiful thing to watch. They have taught me much, “ she adds.

Diane is married to Jim, a retired college professor. They have 2 grown, married sons and 4 grandchildren.

When not involved with her CASA kids, Diane enjoys spending time with her grandchildren and working at the Madison Visitor’s Center. Diane and Jim also enjoy traveling and are doing so much more now that they have the time to do so.

We appreciate all that you do for the children in our circuit, Diane!
